A useful review plan is not a list of ambitious promises. It is a small system that can be repeated. Begin by choosing one weak area. Then set a fixed time, prepare a limited number of questions, and record why each mistake occurred. At the end of the week, do not simply count how many pages you finished. Check whether the same errors appear again. If they do, return to the concept and explain it in your own words. Progress becomes visible when your decisions become faster and your explanations become clearer.

第三部分 阅读理解 (30分)

共两篇，每篇5题；答案必须能在原文找到证据。

A college study group tested two ways of learning formulas. Group One reread the notes three times. Group Two closed the notes after each reading and wrote down everything they could remember. Both groups spent the same total time. Immediately after the session, their scores were similar. One week later, Group Two remembered more and made fewer application errors. The researchers concluded that retrieving knowledge, although more difficult, produced stronger long-term memory than repeated exposure. They also warned that retrieval works best when students check and correct their answers soon afterwards.
